The Wilderness Warrior: Theodore Roosevelt And The Crusade For America
Douglas Brinkley

Despite a privileged and urban childhood, the twenty- sixth president was the most vigorous proponent of early American conservation. The roots of this anomaly, and the epic battles to conserve more than 230 million acres of American wilderness, including the Grand Canyon, are presented with appropriately Rooseveltian vitality and humor by Professor Brinkley.

Poems From The Women's Movement
Honor Moore

Revolutionary passion needs far more dramatic expression than what everyday language can provide. The women's movement of the 60s, 70s and 80s found rich expression in poetry. From Sylvia Path's acerbic commentary on marriage "It can sew, it can cook/ It can talk, talk, talk" to Sonia Sanchez' ringing "But I am what I/am, woman, alone/amid all this noise", this collection by poet and memoirist Honor Moore makes for an engrossing read.

A Reenchanted World: The Quest For A New Kinship With Nature
James William Gibson

Sociologist and commentator, Gibson, draws together strands of movements, ideas, studies, and personalities to argue that two centuries of focused industrialization during which nature was viewed as little more than raw resources, is currently being tempered by a growing reconnection to the natural world. The tone is both explanatory and exhortative.

Born To Run: A Hidden Tribe, Superathletes, And The Greatest Race The World Has Never Seen (sound recording)

The brooding Copper Canyons of Mexico are host to the remote tribe of the Tarahumara, known for their legendary capacity to run barefoot for extreme distances without any obvious discomfort. Journalist and former war correspondent McDougall provides a riveting examination of running as an exhilarating sport, as well as an apt metaphor for cross-cultural empathy and living life to its fullest. Read by Fred Sanders.

Double Take: A Memoir
Kevin Connolly

In this unusual memoir, the author-photographer uses wry intelligence and artistry to record people's curiosity and reactions to his legless state. Traveling with the help of a skateboard, all the way from his home in Montana through Malaysia and sixteen other countries, Connolly captures over 30,000 stares and condenses those to a distilled brew that is both visually arresting and philosophically thought-provoking.
